TOOTH OR CONSEQUENCES

TOOTH SENSITIVITY

Is the taste of ice cream or a sip of coffee sometimes a painful experience? Does brushing or flossing make you wince occasionally? If so, you may have sensitive teeth. In healthy teeth, a layer of enamel protects the crowns of your teeth. Under the gum line, a layer called cementum protects the tooth root and under that is the dentin. Dentin is less dense than enamel and cementum and contains microscopic canals called tubules. When dentin loses its protective enamel covering or cementum, the tubules allow heat, cold, acidic or sticky foods to reach the nerves and cells inside the tooth. Dentin may also be exposed when gums recede. This can result in hypersensitivity. Proper oral care is the key to preventing sensitive tooth pain.

Routine professional dental care is an important step in reducing the risk of gum disease. Don't overlook this important element of your health. Establish your oral hygiene plan today by calling for an appointment.
